In these concertos, Bach adopted the usual three movement order of the Italian concertos (fast - slow - fast), themes built on the tonic triad, continuously driving rhythms, and the ritornello form for the first movement (alternation between solo and full orchestral forces).

This concerto and only one other (the last) are worthy of special mention: they are ripieno concertos, that is, they are written without featuring any solo instruments.

The transference of musical material from one medium to another was a common practice in Bach's day. Hence we find that the first movement of this concerto (with two horns and three trumpets added) later becomes the sinfonia of Cantata 174. Composers seemed to feel that a good idea deserved comparable mileage.
